Entomopathogenic nematodes (EPNs) are important agents in biological pest control and have been used to control various agricultural pests worldwide. Although EPNs are usually highly virulent, a nonhost plant, not the intended host, can be infected by the EPNs and acquire the ability to resist this pest. The physiological mechanisms of associative resistance in nonhost plants were studied by using the fusiform EPN Heterorhabditis megadora. A consortia of the entomopathogenic fungus Beauveria bassiana was composed of two strains of B. bassiana, Bb8 and Bb12, and two entomopathogenic nematode strains, H. megadora Cm1 and H. megadora Cm2. Fungus-nematode association in vitro, in greenhouse and field was evaluated. In greenhouse, the association of the fungus and the nematode reduced the mortality of first-instar larvae of a polyphagous pest, the pink leafworm Manduca sexta. To elucidate the mechanisms involved, the fungus-nematode association was evaluated in pot trials with one of the B. bassiana strains. In combination with a second entomopathogenic nematode strain H. megadora Cm1, the fungus decreased the level of parasite-induced larval mortality. The maximum percentage of reduction in plant damage was reached when the strain Bb8 was used, and the second strain H. megadora Cm1 was not necessary for the biocontrol effect. Similarly, the treatment of potted strawberry plants with the fungus and the nem
