Recent research has reported that music information embedded in both speech-like signal envelopes and noise masks can be extracted and identified. This study explores the implications of such findings on the further study of the noise masking properties of musical stimuli and its potential applications to speech perception in noise. To this end, we describe a perceptual history model of music and language identification that may be useful in uncovering the representations underlying music-language and music-masking interactions. The model was composed of a V-shaped speech envelope and a noise mask with and without temporal cues. The model-derived envelope was analyzed by an empirical Bayes procedure for identification with a 15-item phoneme set (F(0)=200). The main result was a nonlinear relationship between input (envelope) and response (identification) that showed a crossing at an Occ13bf012
