The delivery of oxygen can affect cell proliferation, differentiation, and cell-cell and cell-extracellular matrix interactions. Moreover, oxygen can influence wound healing. In this study, we showed that the rate of fibroblast proliferation at early time points was increased by reducing the oxygen concentration. Within the developing skin, oxygen tension would be expected to be different between the epidermis and the dermis. We cultured dermal fibroblasts in oxygen tension of 5 and 20% and epidermal keratinocytes in 20 and 5% oxygen. The oxygen tension within the dermis was measured using microelectrodes. Under the 5% oxygen tension, the epidermal keratinocytes of the cultured skin were shown to proliferate more rapidly than the dermal fibroblasts. Under the 20% oxygen tension, however, we observed that the fibroblasts in the dermis were proliferating more rapidly than the keratinocytes, though this phenomenon was not seen under the 5% oxygen tension. Subsequently, we tried to cultivate dermal fibroblasts and epidermal keratinocytes simultaneously.
