Tourniquet inflation time of 150 min in normovolemic rabbits was associated with an increase of thromboxane B2 in the arterial blood up to 350 pmol/l. This increased thromboxane B2 level was accompanied by an increased number of erythrocytes adhering to the venular wall of the subcutaneous tissue. The venular wall showed an aggregating reaction and an increase of capillary filtration pressure. The thrombus on the microvascular wall consisted of fibrin only and red blood cells in small numbers. The volume of the subcutaneous tissue was found to be reduced by 25%. The increase of thromboxane B2 induced a similar reaction in the isolated perfused microcirculation of the rabbit subcutaneous tissue. The results of the present study confirm that all phases of arterial thrombosis of the microcirculation observed in the macrovasculature (microvascular thrombosis, arterial wall alterations, development of a thrombus) may be also accompanied by thromboxane B2-induced changes in the venular wall. Thus, thrombus formation in macro and microvasculature is closely related.Approach Description In 1989 the discovery of the small GTPase Gα13, by the group led by Dr. David Austin, established the existence of GPCRs. In the early days of the GPCR field, most efforts were placed on the specific isolation of GPCRs. As the understanding of their function and
