A common problem in editing large image files is that you don't have the time to go through everything to find a place you're willing to say, "This is great!" You can employ a more effective workflow, of course. For example, these days many people send out their images for review via a specialized service such as LensRentals. Feedback from its users has found that users will fire off more objections to an image than they would be willing to say in person. As a prospective customer, I'm sure you can imagine how satisfying it is to find that others are saying what you've already thought about the photo, and there's no need to waste time sitting through the screen or the panel with the reviewer. You can skip that work if you're serious about making the right choice. Rather than ticking off items, you determine whether something is working for you or not by simply marking the idea as one of your "I like this" or "I do not like this." At the same time, you could get a feel for the range of opinions that are held within a review panel by looking at what you do like and dislike. Lightroom has always been one of my favorite apps; I use it for any type of shooting I perform at different times, and its filters, basic adjustments, and presets make it a useful tool in tons of genres. But as good of an app as Lightroom may be, it may not be suitable for everyone. Elyn, a 27-year-old music producer, for example, still sees it as a bit too complicated. "I try to use Lightroom but it's just not for me," she says. "I just can't get the hang of it." Jeanette, another music producer, hasn't used Lightroom in a while because "I hate the way it looks." As an alternative, viewers are often turned to Apple's Aperture, which the company sells as its image management and processing app. "Aperture is more flexible at the moment," says Elyn. "It has a way more intuitive interface and less clutter." For Shawn, a 22-year-old graphic designer, the only app he uses is Photoshop, the only version he has ever used. "I couldn't imagine using someone else's software," he says.
